

The fantasy goes like this:

I am a “plant” in the audience of The Price Is Right. During a commercial break, the announcer calls me to stand up with a question for him and a special question for Drew Carey. I stand and appear surprised as a normal person in the audience would. Once I have everyone's attention, I would speak to the announcer. (Sarcastic option – I'm wearing a shirt that says, “I am not a plant!”)

“Sir, do you remember ONE of Drew's many successes called Whose Line Is It Anyway?”

The announcer would reply, dripping with sarcasm.

“Do you mean the one where the slogan was 'Where everything's made up and the points don't matter?’”

After a bit of crowd reaction (with expert comedic timing), he would continue,

“I say, uh, I say, 'Where everything's made up and the points don't matter?!”

“That's the one!” I would blurt out.

After an audience reaction, I would continue to Drew.

“Drew, Sir, I'm terribly sorry to bother you with this. Sir, please I haven't eaten in 3 days. I wonder, if it's not too much trouble, could you please spare me a fewpoints?!”

After that, it's all up to Drew. I'm hoping he will pause for drama, make a look like he's thinking, do some addition on his fingers, shrug his shoulders then shout loudly,

“A MILLION POINTS FOR EVERYONE IN THE HOUSE!!”

Needless to say, the crowd will explode with applause and laughter.

This fantasy is best when I know about it, the announcer knows about it, maybe the audience knows about it or maybe they've been teased with some of it. The main point is to surprise Drew and let him ad-lib. I think he would say and do things that are just as funny as I imagined in the conversation above.

I'm also starting to think I could make my rendition of this thing myself and put it up on youtube or sending it to The Price Is Right to fill in the parts with the announcer or Drew.

The best possible rendering of this fantasy is if I send this to Ellen Degeneres and her people and they make it happen.
